Law Library Newsletter Archive www.co.collin.tx.us/law_library/index.jsp

Looking for a web site or law journal article we reviewed in an old issue of Truth, Justice, and Information for All? Look no further than the Law Library's web site! We keep an online archive of back issues of the Law Library newsletter right on our web site. The archive extends back to 2003!

Google's Custom Search Engine <http://google.com/coop/cse/>

Google's new Custom Search Engine allows you to create your own unique search engine from web sites that YOU choose. Instead of searching the entire web, your search engine only searches those web sites that you have personally selected. You can save and name your custom search engine. This is similar to the search engine, Rollyo (www.rollyo.com) that we mentioned in a previous issue earlier this year. Please note that in order to use Google's Custom Search Engine you must set up a free Google account (e.g.: Gmail).

Acronyma www.acronyma.com

This handy tool helps you translate an unknown acronym. You just type in the acronym and Acronyma generates a listing of possible definitions for that acronym.

The opinions expressed on these web sites are not representative of those of Collin County or the Collin County Law Library.

Print vs. Online Resources: Who do you trust?

Answer:

Free electronic sources are convenient, but can contain errors, or even simply not be up to date. It is always a good idea to check the print authority just to be sure!

A recent research question posed to the Law Library illustrated the importance of checking the print authority for a law.

An attorney was looking for a particular section of the United States Code. The statute had been cited by the opposing party and the attorney wanted to take a closer look at the statute. The attorney had already looked up the statute online on Cornell's Legal Information Institute website (www.law.cornell.edu) - an excellent free online legal information resource. The language of the statute as printed on Cornell's site, however, did not match the language cited by opposing counsel.

The attorney then decided to check another great online resource, GPO Access (www.gpoaccess.gov). The GPO site is a federal government portal to government information, including the U.S. Code. The same discrepancy in language was found on this site as well.

At this point, the attorney contacted the Law Library. We looked at the print volume of the U.S.C.A. here in the Library and, sure enough, the language cited by the opposing party was found! After closely examining the statute on the Internet, we discovered that the online version of the Code was current through January of 2005. Changes had been made to the statute since that time.

The advent of the Internet has made it easier than ever to access many legal resources online—free of charge. However, it is important to remember that online legal resources may not necessarily be authoritative.
